

Edward Abram Education Business Development Officer

Edward Abram is a proud minority leader representing the minority community, hailing from Oakland, California, where he attended Dominican University of California on a basketball scholarship and earned a Bachelor of Arts in Political Science, later obtaining a Master's Degree in Education from Holy Names University. In 2020, he partnered with Japanese technology billionaire Norio Ichihashi, an early key figure and co-founder in Mobileye, the company that developed autonomous driver less software and was acquired by Intel in 2017 for $15.3 billion in what is believed to be Israel's largest acquisition to date. Based in Los Angeles, Edward leads a minority-owned global technology company (EAI) focused on innovative partnerships with conglomerates, leveraging evolving technologies to produce artificial intelligence-driven engineered pathogen control devices that deliver state-of-the-art safety and security protocols, all manufactured in the USA; furthermore, EAI has built strategic alliances with Native American leaders to advance sustainable Smart Cities programs, providing essential resources for modern society, including fresh and safe water supplies, clean air, net-zero and net-positive energy solutions, and pesticide-free healthy foods to support the mental health and future leadership potential of today's youth.